Poetics in the Ethnographic

Nomi Stone
Princeton University

ARTIST’S BIO | Nomi Stone is a Postdoctoral Research Associate at Princeton University. She has recently published articles in Cultural Anthropology and American Ethnologist, and her poetry appears in The New Republic, The Best American Poetry, POETRY Magazine, American Poetry Review, Tin House, and widely elsewhere. Nomi Stone has won a Pushcart Prize and was a Fulbright scholar in creative writing in Tunisia. She has recently served as a judge for the Society of Humanistic Anthropology’s Ethnographic Poetry Competition. Her first poetry collection, entitled Stranger’s Notebook (TriQuarterly Books), was published in 2008, and her forthcoming collection, Kill Class, will be published in 2019 by Tupelo Press.

Keywords: Poetry; Ethnography; Anthropology; Militarism; United States.
Introduction

“At this hour, the fictional country is still, and twelve men glide through the dark into a cotton field.”

“the fictional country stills
in the hour’s resin. Men glide through the pinedark
into fields of cotton.”

As both a poet and an anthropologist, I mostly think about what it is like to be inside a body and to be inside time. To write field-notes as a poet is to store the sensory and the musical alongside the analytic, to think in particular about the rhythms of that which is lived. These two modes of seeing spark and extend each other. For example, the first sentence (see above) of my ethnographic monograph in progress, “Pineland: Human Technology and American Empire” (now a finalist for the University of California Press’s Atelier series) came from a poem I had already written in my collection of poetry based on the same fieldwork, Kill Class (Tupelo Press 2019). I began the ethnography with an image of 12 training soldiers covertly entering a war game at night, by parachute. But it’s not enough to just say the thing. I wanted my readers to feel the eerie, almost-sweet vertigo in the soldier’s descent, the late hour a sort of dark honey around us—an enclosure, the men are told to make no sound—as they tumble into the cotton field (there, such softness, the cotton bolls under their boots). The prose sentence in the ethnography borrows the affect, rhythm and imagistic arc of the poem: we begin our entry with time (“this hour”), then stare into the strangeness of place (“the fictional country”), and its state (“still”), and each of these clauses slows the reader, before we arrive at the key action in the sentence: “twelve men glide through the dark.” Their bodies fall through the dark like the l’s in the words, and the sentence itself brings us through their descent all the way down to the field where they land. That moment of secrecy and almost terrible softness: this calm before the war begins. In this way, an ethnography contains the ghosts, the trace-structures of the poem.

First, a link to a recent ethnographic article: https://culanth.org/articles/887-living-the-laughscram-human-technology-and. And below, a selection from Kill Class.
Soldiers Parachuting into the War Game

The fictional country stills
in the hour’s resin. Men glide through pinedark into fields of cotton. Eyeless seeds above: Is it, lord, snowing? They cross
into the mock village:
dome goat road row
Iraqi role-players whispering in collapsible houses
made for daily wreckage.
Lights pulse, pixels
within them. In one room:

a tiny fake coffin no
isn’t here a body no, nowhere here my body. Input: say a kind word to the villager / output villager soaked clean of prior forms of place. It is (subtract this footprint) snowing. Now fade.

(Originally appeared in Poetry Northwest)
War Catalogues

Soldiers collect & number:
pigment, hair, jade,
roasted meat, timber,
cum. The enemy’s flute; the face of an enemy

as he holds his young;
the enemy’s face the moment it’s harmed. The woods are a class in what they can take. The country is fat. We eat from its side.

(Originally appeared in Academy of American Poets Poem-a-Day)
The Anthropologist

I bring my waterproof notebook, Arabic phrasebook, bug spray, a terror of snakes. I drive the wrong way and the car is spat onto Sanitary Field Road, or onto the road for Normandy or littler massacres. Or for the meat you eat after. Do I take it with vinegar or sweet? Separate the shoulder from the rib. Spit me onto Pork Chop Hill, Ham Road, Chicken Lane, Devil Way, and into the hold of these woods. So, what do you study? Is this part of a class for you? Jeeps grow and grow under the pines. It’s true, they take me for BBQ after, ask me am I comfortable, do I want dessert and what do I think I know about them and do I know any Americans who went to war or don’t I and if I don’t who do I think I am, and do I agree that through my stomach, they will get my heart?

(Originally appeared in Puerto del Sol)
War Game: Plug and Play

Wait. Begin Again.
Reverse loop. Enter the stage.
The war scenario has: [vegetable stalls], [roaming animals], and [people] in it. The people speak the language of a country we are trying to make into a kinder country. Some of the people over there are good / others evil / others circumstantially bad / some only want cash / some just want

their family to not die.
The game says figure

out which are which.

(Originally appeared in Painted Bride Quarterly)
Driving out of the Woods to the Motel

It’s true, for your second job, you’re a parking attendant or a poultry process worker: stun and kill them, trim them and cut into portions, bone and weigh and grade them. You’re a hotel maid. If an American soldier stays in the room you clean, you will fold his uniform as crisply as love, a message that you too call it a liberation. Your brother calls it an occupation, tells you: Do not become American. Brother, the sanctions: 2 kilos sugar / 3 rice / 1 oil / 9 flour parsed into sections? Buy lipstick at the drug store. Watch Ramadan soaps. Number your hungers. Braise the bird until it is gold with lemon. Unstring your wish:

    one bone liberation,
    one bone occupation.

(Originally appeared in The Arkansas International) Human Technology

Sunlit and dangerous, this country road.
We are follicle and meat and terror and the machines leave their shells naked on the ground.

One soldier makes a museum in his basement.

Each mannequin in brass, incombustible coats:
I am walking between their blank faces, their bullets traveling at the speed of sound. One soldier who roasted a pig on his porch barbecuing until sinews were tender tells me he waited above the Euphrates and if they tried to pass even after we told them not to, they deserved it: pop (deserve it); pop (deserve it). Euphrates, your dark tunnel out is rippling around us.

In the war, a child approaches a tank as one soldier counts the child’s steps. In the town, I drink a bottle of wine with that soldier among barber shops, boot repair shops. Is she my friend? I weep to her. I’ve lost who I thought I loved and she says I did this thing and to whom was that child beloved?

Find common ground, the soldiers say. Humanize yourselves. Classify the norm of who you’re talking to, try to echo it. Do this for your country, says one soldier; we are sharks wearing suits of skin. Zip up.

This spring, in the chilly, barely blooming city Solmaz says enough of this emptied word “empathy.”

Ask for more: for rage. For love. On the porch, as the sun goes, the dark pools around us and one soldier says it is nightfall. I am tired. I did not mean for it to go on this long. That soldier across the table, we lock eyes.

He tells me: in the occupied land we are the arm, they are the weapon. The weapon in this case is a person. Choose a person who knows who is bad. Make them slice open the skin of their country: only they can identify the enemy. Say yes or no: if a man squints while under the date palm; if a woman does not swing her arms while walking. Sir, my child was not with the enemy.

He was with me in this kitchen, making lebna at home. The yogurt still is fresh on his wrist.

(originally appeared in Plume)
Nomi Stone
Department of Anthropology
116 Aaron Burr Hall
Princeton, NJ 08544
nsstone@princeton.edu